Featured Artist: Dr. Mary Stokrocki

Dr. Mara Pierce – In this issue of Voices, Dr. Mary Stokrocki, Professor Emeritus of Arizona State University shares some of her computer generated imagery (CGI) and research with virtual worlds. Thank you for sharing, Dr. Stokrocki!

Transforming Virtual Identity

Virtual worlds are one of the major sites of informal multiliteracy education. “With over 60 online virtual worlds, 400 universities offering courses, and 50% from different countries, these sites offer tremendous opportunities for artistic teaching and learning” (Stokrocki, 2014). Second Life, still one of the most popular virtual worlds, has helped me grow by increasing my literacy skills to include multi ways of communicating and teaching expanding my creativity and vision through changing avatar identity. Identity is a set of unique characteristics that denote a person. A person’s identity however is multifaceted and transforming; parts are hidden, determined by culture [and community], and are never final (Kroger, 1996). Jagodzinski (2004) reported that media immersion offers brief transcendence from these youths’ preoccupation with their own life problems, and ways of role-playing solutions. In our postmodern world, a person, young and old, can have multiple identities in the digital universe, more specifically virtual worlds called avatars in online communities. Avatars are representations of people who participate in virtual worlds (Meadows, 2008). In her study of avatar identities, Liao (2014) raised questions about the connections we make between representation and identity, what constitutes identity, and the ways in which identity and representation may both dovetail with and yet contradict each other. My avatars transform in different ways in different worlds.

Transformations

My normal avatar on Second life is

human. Marylou Goldrosen built her Art Ark school (Figure 2a) and started the Art Ark Warriors Group (Figure 2b). The kilim is a handmade, sumac rug made of silk, cotton, and wool from Diyarbakir, East Turkey that I purchased when working for the World Bank in Ankara in 1995 (Stokrocki, 1999). I use the carpet to teach art criticism, inviting students to look for treasures in the rug and on Second Life.

On Halloween, my avatar each year turns into Spider Women, celebrating the Feast of Fools. She loves to spy, dance, and invite students to reinvent themselves (Figure 3a). This ghoulish explores society’s foolish antics (Stokrocki, 1997). She loves the mesh netting too (Figure 3b). Watch Teaching at the Art Ark in Second Life 3.0 (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9qLqVYF10&feature=youtu.be9qLqVYF10>).

One of my graduate students, Sandy Andrews [avatar Ozma), introduced me to Floaters on Second Life, I was a cat, representing my beloved feline who just died. Ozma invited me to teach at her Floaters site on the virtual world of Second Life (Figure 1).

Floaters is a safe place for disenfranchised people to share their artworks. The site still exists on Second Life with updated exhibitions from real life, The Millet House in Mesa Arizona. Our research shared the importance of empowering poor youths, mentoring them, and helping them develop personal learning environments (Stokrocki & Andrews, 2010).

The Women’s Caucus, of which I was Co-President (2018-20), challenged me to transcend my typical identity. I chose a Fembot [robot – an inclusionary feminist, despite the pink]. See Figure 4. I had to compile my research and teaching on cyber worlds (Stokrocki, 2015). Andrea Karpati (2014) reviewed my work as “richly illustrated and carefully designed for easy use, offers witty narratives on good art education practice in cyberspace and evidence-based reports on student development that make it a valuable resource for art teachers, trainers and researcher as well” (p. 332). Eventually, I learned to wrap artwork around my entire avatar body (Figure 5). My students loved to interview Ronin Shippe’s artwork, made in Windows “Paint” program, that he constantly displayed on Second Life.

When teaching local students on the Opensimulator, another virtual world site sponsored by Sandrine Han from the University of British Columbia, my identity transformed into Queen Bee (Figure 5) with her own hive. Locally, she is Lady Bug at my local Earth Bazaar, where she roams around asking attendants “What’s bugging them?”

My most notable transmutation however is The Lizard of ARS/ART (Stokrocki, 2016), who can change her color to blend into the landscape, can give birth without males, and regenerate her tail (Figure 7). She wanders around looking for a new tail/tale and inviting Her identity transforms, a re-presentation of existing appropriated material (Baum, 1900) in different ways. When reviewing appropriation history, Lethem (2007) argues that recombining sound, visuals and text are plagiarisms that date back to Shakespeare et al. Such image reuse is so easy and inexpensive with digital media. Downloading the lizard head, I wear it as a mask with my green jumpsuit and visit students in the schools to ask them to reinvent my tail/tale and help write a new parody.

Conclusion

Virtual identity encompasses all of these community relations, environments, and new platforms (Sansar, 2017). Identity transforms faster when reinventing ARS (Figure 8). This is the childish in me as revealed in Our Digital Selves: My Avatar is me (Depres, 2018).

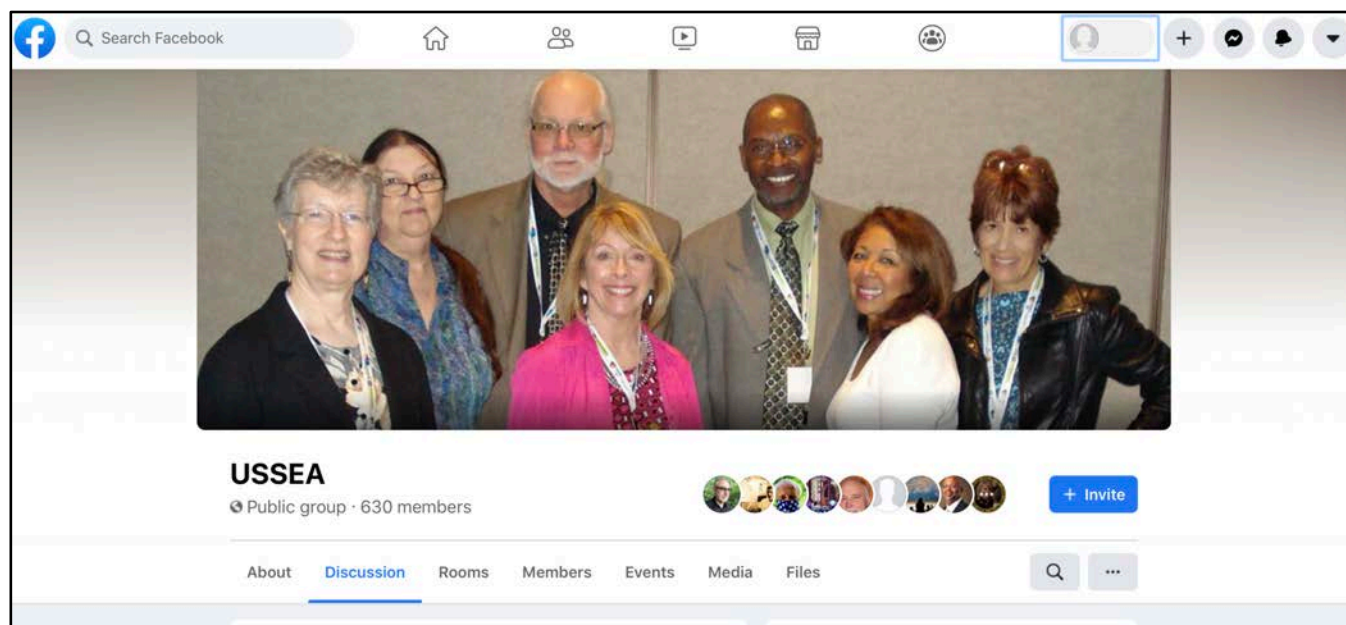

Figure 8. Don't get her mad because she will turn BURNING RED like a chameleon. Her gusto transforms and off she goes leaping around for more artful ideas to transplant.
